Obama plays dominoes, jokes about The Beast in Cuban TV skit

Obama plays dominoes.

USPA NEWS - U.S. President Barack Obama finally got a chance to meet PÃ¡nfilo, the Cuban television character, when he appeared in a skit shot in Havana for a popular comedy show that sometimes pokes fun at the Cuban government.

The U.S. embassy in Cuba released the video on Wednesday, a day after Obama concluded his 48-hour visit. (here)
Before coming to Cuba, Obama made another video in which he joked on the telephone with PÃ¡nfilo, a bumbling old man played by actor Luis Silva in the show Vivir del Cuento.

He mixes in a little Spanish in both skits, each time using the very Cuban slang "¿Qué bolÃ¡?" (What's up?)

In a country where the Communist government tightly controls the media, PÃ¡nfilo is allowed to satirize the difficulties of daily life.

While the previous video was shot separately in Washington and Havana, this time Obama went to the set of Vivir del Cuento, pretending to stop by PÃ¡nfilo's home to learn how to play dominoes.

Obama praises Cuban food and music and remarks how welcoming Cubans were to him and his family.

He also jokes about his armored limousine nicknamed The Beast, which proved to be a source of fascination for Cubans.

One of the Cuban characters is worried whether the car would be safe at a baseball game the president attended in Havana.

"I just hope that no foul balls hit The Beast," Obama said.

After Obama leaves, PÃ¡nfilo laments, "Oh my God, I forgot to show him my ration card."

Many Cubans depend on their monthly ration card for food to supplement the average state salary of $25 per month.
